Did you know?

We often wonder why it takes so long for a project to get going. That is because there is often a great deal of detail that needs to be formulated and agreed to before the project can get started.

We just see the turbines being erected and operational, but this newsletter we are going to talk about the detail that goes into erosion and sediment control on site.

As we are in the Sydney Water Catchment, each part of the construction has diagrams and control measures to ensure that the waterways or the surrounding lands do not become silted or eroded. Then after works the area is revegetated.

Even the excavation and backfilling of trenches must follow the process that has been agreed to as part of the Erosion and Sediment control plan. Even though we do see disturbance of the neighboring farmland during construction, careful measures have been put in place for control and regeneration to ensure serious damage does not occur.
